"A Sonnet for the Hunter" concerns the reactions of several patients in a mental institution when they are informed that their psychiatrist has been killed in an automobile accident. In an effort to help a few of the more disturbed patients accept reality, Nurse Hemmings (Paula Shaw) talks the reluctant hospital administrator, Jarnigan (James Menhenhall), into releasing them into her custody to attend the funeral.

Lydia (Shelly Winters), a patient with a glib and paranoid personality, is convinced she is a witch. She takes a special interest in several of her fellow patients, including Mary (Lynn Bancroft). At the funeral, Lydia escapes in the hospital van with Julietta (Corinne Neuchateau) and Hattie (Francesca De Sapia), leaving Mary behind. A search is mounted for the patients.

Hiding in the remains of the old house where Lydia was born and reared, the three patients conduct a mock ritual, convinced they can bring the doctor's spirit back from the dead. Meanwhile, a recent divorcee (Gary Swanson) and his son (David Mendenhall) are on a weekend hunting trip. After a heated argument about the father's new girlfriend, the boy runs away in tears, becomes lost, and falls into a ravine.

As the hunter attempts to find his son, he discovers the old house and is captured and tied up by the patients who believe he is the resurrected doctor. He is toyed with by Lydia, who now has the advantage of his shotgun. The hunter realizes he is dealing with disturbed people, and his concern for his son now includes fear for his own life. Lydia and Hattie go in search of herbs and charms to complete their ritual and to fully restore the memory of the "doctor."

The hunter escapes from Julietta and later finds his son unconscious in the ravine. When the "witches" approach, he covers the boy with leaves and decoys Lydia and her friends away, resulting in his recapture. In the terrifying and fiery conclusion, the patients complete their ritual and recite the "sonnets" they have written for the hunter.
